- B. Underlying source of the problem
- C. Competition and their approach
- D. Vendors input and paid solutions

Answer: B

Explanation:

Explanation

When examining a business problem, it's always important to define the underlying source of the problem.

This identification can help resolve the matter faster and for less cost. This resolution can also help to prevent the problem from continuing with a new solution that doesn't properly address the problem.

Answer B is incorrect. Competition and their approach may be useful in some instances, but it's not the best answer considering the question.

Answer A is incorrect. This isn't a valid answer for the question.

Answer C is incorrect. There's no evidence that a dataflow has been created, or even needs to be created.
