An information security manager must understand the relationship between information security and business operations in order to:

- A. understand the threats to the business.
- B. determine likely areas of noncompliance.
- C. assess the possible impacts of compromise.
- D. support organizational objectives.

Answer: D

Explanation:

Explanation

Security exists to provide a level of predictability for operations, support for the activities of the organization and to ensure preservation of the organization. Business operations must be the driver for security activities in order to set meaningful objectives, determine and manage the risks to those activities, and provide a basis to measure the effectiveness of and provide guidance to the security program. Regulatory compliance may or may not be an organizational requirement. If compliance is a requirement, some level of compliance must be supported but compliance is only one aspect. It is necessary to understand the business goals in order to assess potential impacts and evaluate threats. These are some of the ways in which security supports organizational objectives, but they are not the only ways.
