NEW QUESTION: 1

A compensating balance:

- A. Is a level of inventory held to compensate for variations in usage rate and lead time.
- B. Is used to compensate for possible losses on a marketable securities portfolio.
- C. Is the amount of prepaid interest on a loan.
- D. Compensates a financial institution for services rendered by providing it with deposits of funds.

Answer: D

Explanation:

Banks sometimes require a borrower to keep a certain percentage of the face amount of a loan in a noninterest-bearing checking account. This requirement raises the effective rate of interest paid by the borrower. This greater rate compensates a bank for services provided and results in greater profitability for the financial institution. Funds kept as a compensating balance can often be withdrawn if a certain average balance is maintained.
